

Who Can Be Held Liable for a Truck Accident?

Most people assume that it is automatically the driver who is held liable in an accident. This isn't always the case.

There are different parties who may be held liable when a semi truck collides with another vehicle.

In some cases, more than one party is deemed liable.

1. The Driver

Only when the driver was negligent or made some type of error will they be held liable in the accident. They may have been distracted, or loaded the trailer improperly.

2. The Owner

In some cases, an owner responsible for maintenance could be the person held liable in a collision. While the driver may sometimes own the truck, this isn't always true.

3. The Leasee

Whomever leases trucks to fleet managers is responsible for ensuring each truck is safe to drive. If the leasee is negligent in their duties, they could be held liable for an accident.

4. The Manufacturer

When it is discovered that an issue with the truck caused the accident, the manufacturer may be held responsible. They may be in further legal trouble if there was an undisclosed defect.

Learn more at: RafiLawFirm.com